Ánandanagar --- Geography and Geology

(contd... from previous issue)

Bábá has described the process of the formation of this land mass in this book called “Sabhyatár Ádi Vindu Rápha”.

We quote from that book below.

“It was an ocean agitated by tall waves. The ocean had no name or appellation. Who would give it a name? Who would tell others about it? Man had not yet arrived on earth. It was three hundred million years before our times. There was no vegetation on earth that could identify or give a name to a parcel of arid rocky land. This nameless rocky soil was later given the name of Rápha. Rápha is a word from an ancient Austric language. It means “a land of red soil.” In the earth of those days, there was no Áryávarta; there was no plain of Bengal and the south. Deserts of Rajasthan and Gujarat were also absent. The northern part of the Arabian Sea was also missing. The southern part was there. It joined the Deccan with Andamans, Malaysia, Indonesia and Australia, above water at some point and under water at other points. In that manless world, Rápha was even more ancient than other areas. Its snow-clad peaks had given birth to many rivers. These rivers fed by molten snow made their journey into the ocean; some to the east, and others to the south-east.

Days passed. Time moved on from beginning-lessness to eternity. The mountains, acted upon by storms and thunderstorms, were slowly eroded. They lost their crowns of snow and were reduced in stature. As the mountains become smaller, the basins between mountains rose. We can see today wavy red soil in Western Rápha --- the waves advance towards east o to merge in the distant blue; in their reverse journey, they tell us of a lost address. That undulating land is our Rápha.”

The name of Ánandanagar has not been taken. But the description is in its entirety a geological description of Ánandanagar. The Belamu hill on south of central Ánandanagar is the oldest hill in the world. We call it a hill now. But in the past, it was a giant mountain taller than the Himalayas. Its erosion has converted a part of the sea into a valley, Geography tells us --- Hills are older than mountains.

The soil of Anandanagar is the most ancient soil in the world. Therefore it keeps under it plenty of wealth. If this wealth is utilized, men of Anandanagar will be among the richest in the world.
